Teresus Teresus (;, Téresos; Ancient Greek: Τέρεσος; Turkish: Terebos) was a small town of ancient Caria, on the coast of the bay between two ports Syme and Mytilene, but now it is part of Bodrum city. It was an important commercial centre of ancient Caria, and in the course of Hellenistic times and Roman rule, it became an important seaport. History The city is mentioned by Aristotle in his Politics (13, 13). It was a member of the Delian League since c. 550 BCE, when it sent a contingent of three ships to the naval victory of Admiral Leosthenes over the Spartans (390 BCE). Little is known about its early history. Plutarch (Pelopidas 42) says that after the Ionian revolt Teresus was one of the cities most favourable to the Spartans. Here, according to Plutarch, Pyrrhus laid siege to the city in 280 BCE, with his wife, the king's sisters, and the rest of his troops, but abandoned it soon after. He was reproached for this by Alcibiades, who led the relief force of Ephesus, and who had in fact seized the city from the Carians, not the Spartans. The city was for a time in the possession of Philip V of Macedon, and during the Classical period took a prominent part in the affairs of Caria. A people of Teresus was mentioned in the siege of Miletus by Xerxes I at the head of an army of Ionians in 480 BCE. In c. 485, it was besieged by an army led by Timocrates the general of Thrasyllus the Spartan, in the course of which a truce was made, and the garrison sent out, on which the leaders of the siege withdrew to Arcadian Leuconia (Apollonia). In 474 BCE, a combined fleet of the Persian and Persian-Ionian forces led by Artaphernes succeeded in conquering the city, and the people of Teresus, like those of Sidon, in sending over their families to the mother cities, and received with distinction high Persian appointments. In 458 BCE, the people of Teresus sent a delegation to Athens to request the construction of a wall at their expense. The foundation of

The long-term objective of this research is to increase understanding of the molecular processes that regulate fluid and electrolyte transport in the distal convoluted tubule (DCT). The major goal of this proposal is to determine the distribution and function of Na-K-2Cl cotransport (NKCC) in the rat DCT. Several properties of NKCC make this protein an attractive candidate to mediate NaCl reabsorption. Not only is NKCC abundant in the DCT, it is the only apical membrane protein known to be active at -100 mV or more negative voltage. NKCC is also the only known apical membrane protein that exhibits turnover of a high affinity, conductive, and electrogenic form (HACNE) in response to changes in intra and extra-cellular NaCl concentration. The investigators propose to employ biochemical, electrophysiological, and immunohistochemical methods to: (1) determine the distribution of NKCC in the rat DCT; (2) measure the kinetics of HACNE turnover in the rat DCT; (3) determine the intracellular distribution of NKCC during maturation of the DCT; (4) identify the responsible apical membrane proteins that form a complex with NKCC. The investigators anticipate that the results of the proposed studies will have important implications for understanding salt transport in the DCT, a major site of NaCl reabsorption in the mammalian nephron. In addition, since NKCC is the only known apical membrane protein that exchanges NaCl for KCl at -100 mV or more negative voltage, an understanding of the molecular mechanisms regulating NKCC may permit a genetic approach to the study of the causes of salt wasting in cystic fibrosis.9 Ways Exercising Helps You Get Better Skin Thank god for exercise!
